increase the survival and reduce treatment side effects for cancer patients. In this review, principles, application and advances in radiation therapy with their biological end points are discussed. Key words: Cancer, Radiation therapy, Linear energy transfer, Cell death. Introduction Cancer remains leading cause of death globally.

cancer treatments. Targeted therapy involves developing drugs that block cancer cell proliferation, promote cell cycle regulation or induce apoptosis or autophagy and targeted delivery of toxic substances specifically to cancer cells to destroy them. Targeted therapy involves the use of monoclonal antibodies or oral small drugs [6].

people contracting cancer for each set of assumptions. This analysis indicated a need to implement certain risk management measures to reduce cancer risk in exposed populations. For this purpose, DPR concluded that a cancer risk goal of 1×10^{-5} . for a 70-year lifetime exposure was a reasonable objective for mitigation.

What does radiation therapy do to cancer cells? Given in high doses, radiation kills or slows the growth of cancer cells. Radiation therapy is used to:
• Treat cancer. Radiation can be used to cure cancer, to prevent it from returning, or to stop or slow its growth.
• Reduce symptoms.

The National Cancer Institute (NCI) supports research and development of radiation modifiers for use in cancer treatment. In addition, the National Institute of Allergy and Infectious Diseases (NIAID) now has a research and development of program for radiation mitigators/protectors for nuclear or radiological disasters through the Centers for Medical Countermeasures against Radiation (CMCR) (3 - 6).

Background: Magnetic nanoparticle hyperthermia therapy is a promising technology for cancer treatment, involving delivering magnetic nanoparticles (MNPs) into tumours then activating them using an alternating magnetic field (AMF). The system produces not only a magnetic field, but also an electric field which penetrates normal tissue and induces eddy currents, resulting in unwanted heating of normal tissues.
